Monthly Commentary

A fresh wave of COVID-19 cases spreading across Europe at an alarming rate led German, French, British, Irish, Austrian and Belgium governments to implement economic shutdowns across their respective regions. Socialising will be curtailed significantly as bars and restaurants will be shut. Fearful of the economic fallout that will ensue these nationwide lockdowns, markets sold-off with European markets the hardest hit. The two major European indices, the FTSE 100 Index and the STOXX Europe 50 index declined by 5% and 8% respectively ending the month in negative territory.

The US has also experienced a rise in COVID-19 cases but fear of this new wave is not the only thing that has spooked the markets into action. Talks of additional stimulus being passed by the US congress continue to fail and the 3rd of the November marks the US presidential election which brings its own set of anxiety and fearmongering. The culmination of these fears saw the US benchmark index, the S&P500, end the month down by 3%. Even Big Tech was unable to stop fear and uncertainty growing inside the psyche of market participants. Despite releasing stellar results for the quarter, be it blockbuster e-commerce sales by Amazon, a return to growth in advertising revenue by Alphabet or double-digit growth in cloud revenue from Amazon, Alphabet and Microsoft, Big Tech shares still sold-off as the tech-heavy Nasdaq ended the month 2% lower.

South African equities could not escape the global sell-off as the JSE All Share Index ended the month down 5%. Resources in particular, which have had strong gains over recent months, were down sharply as the JSE Resources Index declined 11% during month. South African Finance Minister Tito Mboweni delivered South's Africa's Medium-Term Budget Policy Statement during the month of October. Creating cause for concern over the South African economy would be the projection of low economic growth over the medium term, South Africa's public debt levels as a percentage of its gross domestic product rising from 58% to over 90% and rising off-balance sheet government liabilities with support continuing to be offered for ailing state owned entities.
